"The lists of idle men in the differ ent unions embraced in the trades opportunity council show a conservative estimate their game. of at least 2,000. There are 16 trades represented in the council, and each union is carrying a list of idle men that will vary from 20 to 200, and in one or two instances the figures will go to 250 men. There are several reasons for this. During the last two months there has been a large influx of working men and skilled laborers, attracted here by the false reports on the scarcity of labor. Building operations are on the wane, and each few
